

ENSA General Assembly 2025/2026

The European Union is preparing to launch its landmark first-ever Anti-Poverty Strategy this year, aiming to lift a crucial 15 million people from poverty by 2030.

This ambitious goal, however, faces a significant risk of failure if it does not place the challenges of persons with disabilities at its absolute core. The current data is stark: nearly 29% of persons with disabilities in the EU are at risk of poverty and social exclusion, a figure dramatically higher than their non-disabled peers and one that tragically keeps rising, with poverty levels among this group increasing in 13 Member States over the last decade. For women with disabilities, this risk climbs even higher to 29.7%.

Poverty for this community is a complex, structural issue driven by multiple, compounding factors. While employment is often touted as the pathway out of poverty, many persons with disabilities are relegated to low-paid, part-time work or face exploitative practices in segregated workshops. This struggle is compounded by flawed social security systems, where attempts to find work result in the reduction or complete loss of essential disability allowances, creating a powerful disincentive to seek employment. Furthermore, the issue of missed opportunities in education is critical, with 24.6% of young persons with disabilities leaving education and training early, severely limiting their long-term career prospects.

Perhaps the most overlooked factor is the hidden cost of disability. Living with a disability involves significant extra costs—from accessible housing and transportation to assistive devices—that can consume over half of a household's disposable income. Coupled with the rising cost of living, which now sees housing costs absorbing 30.4% of their income, these burdens are worsening dramatically. Additionally, informal carers, predominantly women, also face a higher poverty risk due to lost income while providing essential support, especially where state services are lacking.

To ensure the Strategy succeeds, the EU must implement targeted reforms. This includes moving beyond general data collection to gather disaggregated data on poverty by disability type, launching vital research into the additional costs of living in an inaccessible society, and providing guidance on the adequacy of allowances. Crucially, systemic reforms must be introduced to allow individuals to retain their disability allowance while earning an income. Finally, the EU must dedicate more funding toward truly inclusive education, employment, and support for informal carers, including compensation for lost pension contributions. Without these specific, structural changes, the EU risks leaving millions of its most vulnerable citizens behind.

With a focus on the intersection of the EU's Anti-Poverty Strategy and the pressing reality for persons with disabilities, who face a disproportionately high risk of poverty, this event will explore the crucial and frontline role of local authorities—the municipalities and regional bodies—in implementing inclusive strategies, breaking down systemic barriers, and preventing the underlying causes of poverty right where people live.

The discussion will also be the opportunity to better understand linkages between poverty and disability in European Countries, like in Italy.
